“ I worked as a consultant to Joe and his company, Juventas, for nine years. Joe was an absolute pleasure and delight to work with.....His integrity, forthright manner, collaborative nature and gentle but principled character were obvious to all. He will be missed, very much.

“ I worked with Joe on a Juventus trial. He was one of very few people with whom I've worked that I called my friend and continued to stay in contact with long after our working time was over. We shared some good laughs and fun meals. He was clearly dedicated to his wife and family and loved them wholeheartedly. The world is just not that same without him. I wont forget his friendship.

“ I had the good fortune to work with Joe on a study " that spanned two millennia" at Guidant. As a new employee, Joe was a mentor but more importantly a good friend when I needed one. Joe was approachable and shared knowledge freely. He was a fine man and I carry his example to this day. Rest in peace my friend, you finished the race.

“ Joe was indeed one of the brightest, friendliest, caring and most down to earth friends I've know. Always a smile on his face, and a good story to tell. He has left an indelible mark on us all, and is now free of the pain and suffering his physical body required. I can imagine it now: well done good and faithful servant.

“ You never knew what interesting thing you would pick up when you were talking to Joe. Although he never lost his regular-guy-ness, sometimes a nugget of brilliance would just come tumbling out. Like the day when we were in Junior High School when I suddenly found myself with a bloody nose during lunch, and he helpfully suggested that I eat more green leafy vegetables to keep my iron levels up.

There were probably hundreds of other times that he chimed in with stuff like that, almost all of which I have long forgotten, but by far the craziest thing I ever learned from Joe was that you could replace the blades or “heads,” as he called them, in a Norelco razor.

For some reason, the shaving habits of our fathers came up as a topic of lunchtime conversation that day. He said something like his dad’s beard grew so fast that he had to get the heads replaced in his razor every few weeks (or was it months?). My eyes suddenly widened about two notches, and I replied with “YOU CAN REPLACE THE BLADES IN A NORELCO RAZOR???”

As an Asian kid whose dad could get 60 days out of a two-sided razor blade, this was a revelation. I always just assumed that you used a Norelco until the motor burned out (after perhaps 10 or 15 years) at which point you would just toss the thing in the trash and go down to the local Best Catalog Showroom and buy a new one. If I had just paid closer attention to Joe, I probably would have picked up enough knowledge to teach biology or some other science class at a community college. But that day, during the closing days of the Reagan Administration, that was what the Brainiac offered up, and it ROCKED my world. To this day, every time I go to empty the stubble out of my razor, that conversation still pops up in my head, if only for a nanosecond.

“ While I later became fortunate enough to eventually know the entire Pastore family, graduating from both Mentor High School and Ohio University with Carmen, Joe was the first Pastore that I met. It was at the first summer cross country practice before my sophomore year at MHS (he was a senior), and Joe's charisma, kindness and leadership skills were evident the moment we crossed paths. He introduced himself to all of the new sophomores, and made each of us feel welcome and part of the team immediately, something I can still remember nearly thirty years later. The older I get, the more I realize that people like Joe don't come along very often, and while I hadn't seen much of him in recent years, I consider myself lucky to have known him. My sincerest condolences to Heidi and their three boys, as well as the entire Pastore family. I have no doubt his legacy will live on in each of them.

“ Dear Heidi and Family,
Joe did love his Cleveland Indians. One time I went to a game with him in early April as his father had given us tickets. It was so cold, the beer was frozen! It was snowing and miserable but we endured to the end of the game. My heart grieves with you as you try to put Joe's death into perspective but no amount of reasoning can make anyone understand how a brilliant and loving man could be taken from this earth so early. His legacy will live on through your heart and your sons. Peace be with Joe's soul as he begins his new journey. MJ Stroup

“ Dear Heidi - We join you in grief at Joe's passing. It can be so hard for us to understand how God could allow such good people to suffer such hardship. God's will isn't for us to know. Joe touched so many people in his life and was so deeply loved by his family and friends. I do know that Joe is at peace now and no longer in pain. I also know that he will be watching over you and the boys for the rest of your lives. We will continue to keep you all in our prayers. May God bless you with peace and comfort. Sandy & Jeff Dorrian
