“ One time when uncle Joe was working with my father when i was a kid and we were pouring a massive patio and sidewalk and as the job was halfway poured the home owner came out and decided to make critical changes stopping the progress and giving my father no choice but to lose the cement and have to rip the cement out and restart the next day which would cost the company time and money . Uncle Joe did not agree , in 90 plus degree weather in the middle of the sun Uncle Joe insisted that he could save the concrete and began scrubbing the concrete with his float on his hands and knees to rework the cement and make it ready to still be finished and continue the pour. This is the work ethic that was natural to him . He was an extreme perfectionist and had to have everything perfect and would not let that portion of the job be ruined. No matter how many times my dad said forget it he continued to try and try to save it. I was 13 years old at the time and 27 now and still remember how persistent he was to finish that job and think about it in current situations all the time . Uncle Joe was talented in anything he did and I will miss him very much .
